

Central Jutland

Easily the largest and most varied of all Danish regions, Central Jutland encompasses dramatically different features, from the calm beaches of the sheltered east coast to the wild and woolly west coast, battered by North Sea winds. Lying in between, offering visual stimulation among the flatness, is the green and lovely Lake District, home to the country's longest river and highest mountains (which may seem more like molehills to those of you from less height-challenged terrain). This is Mother Nature at her most gentle, so it's the perfect place to leave your worries behind and float down a river.

It's true, you may never have heard of Århus, Jutland's main city and Denmark's second-largest metropolis. That's not to say that you shouldn't have. Århus has much of the appeal of big-sister Copenhagen, but without any big-city stresses. It's wonderfully walkable, and has embellished its rich history with the vibrant atmosphere of a university city, humming with great restaurants, bars, boutiques and plenty of live music. This is a city worthy of a few days on your itinerary, and you'll most likely come away impressed with its attitude and attractions, which include a new art museum that would be the envy of larger cities around the globe.

City appeal aside, the beauty of this region is that you can skip between themes depending on your mood. Fancy some Viking history? Set sail for Hobro. How about religious history? Off to Jelling. Want to explore the great outdoors? Head for Rold Skov or Silkeborg. Are you really up to tackling nature's forces? Let loose on the waters of Hvide Sande. And ok, you've suppressed that inner child long enough – make a beeline for plastic-fantastic Legoland, and beware the accompanying pangs of childhood nostalgia.

pop 300,000

Sure, Århus (pronounced oar-hus) may be Denmark's second-largest city, but it feels more like a relaxed and friendly big town, shy and a little bashful in the shadow of its more glamorous, attention-seeking big sister, Copenhagen.

Regular visitors will notice Århus' growing confidence. The stunning new art museum, ARoS, is a prime example of the city demanding to be noticed. Further evidence can be found in the redevelopment of the Å river through town (once buried under concrete but now flowing again in the public eye), and the boulevard of sleek restaurants that has sprung up alongside it (from the school of obvious names, that would be called Åboulevarden). The city's huge population of students continues to enliven Århus' parks and cobblestone streets (and fill its impressive number of bars). And with the introduction of cheap flights from various points in Europe, savvy travellers are coming to know and appreciate the city's unique charms. The secret is certainly getting out.

HISTORY

Due to its central seaside location, Århus has always been a busy trading town. Its name comes from Aros, meaning 'place at the river's mouth'. Excavations from the mid-1960s suggest the city was founded around 900.

Medieval times were Århus' most turbulent, as the town was wedged in the middle of feuding neighbouring states. King Sweyn II of Denmark and King Magnus of Norway engaged in a major battle off Århus in 1043, and just a few years later, in 1050, Århus was ravaged by the Norwegian warrior king Harald Hardrada. Prosperity was kept in check over the following centuries by raids from rival Vikings and attacks by fearsome Wend pirates.

Stability then ensued until the 1500s and it was during this time Århus flourished as a centre of trade, art and religion. Its natural asset, a large, protected harbour, drew attention from far and wide and in the process turned Århus into one of Jutland's most important transport and trading hubs.

The university has a tale of its own, as Århus established it against the wishes of the national
