

El Petén

Includes ➔

Sayaxché .....	228
Finca Ixobel .....	233
Flores & Santa Elena.....	234
Around Flores.....	242
El Remate .....	244
Tikal .....	246
Uaxactún .....	254
Yaxhá .....	257
Nakum .....	259
Parque Nacional Laguna del Tigre.....	260
El Mirador .....	260

Best Least-Visited Ruins

- ➔ Yaxhá (p257)
- ➔ Ceibal (p229)
- ➔ Uaxactún (p254)
- ➔ El Perú (p260)
- ➔ Aguateca (p231)

Best Places to Stay

- ➔ Posada Caribe (p232)
- ➔ Finca Ixobel (p233)
- ➔ Estación Biológica Las
Guacamayas (p260)
- ➔ Posada del Cerro (p245)
- ➔ Ni'tun Ecological (p243)

Why Go?

Vast, sparsely populated and jungle-covered, Guatemala's largest and northernmost department is ever ripe for exploration. Whether it's the mysteries of the Classic Maya, the biological bounty of the jungle or simply the chance to lounge lakeside that inspires you, it's all here in abundance. How deeply you choose to delve into the Maya legacy will depend on your level of interest/willingness to get your feet muddy. The towering temples of Tikal can be reached by tour from just about anywhere in the country, while more remote sites like El Mirador or Piedras Negras require days of planning and further days of jungle trekking. Wherever you go, you'll be serenaded by a jungle symphony – the forests are alive with parrots, monkeys and larger, more elusive animals. The Maya Biosphere Reserve covers virtually the entire northern third of El Petén, and together with its counterparts in Mexico and Belize forms a multinational wildlife haven that spans more than 30,000 sq km.

When to Go

If you're planning to do much jungle trekking to remote archaeological sites, late February to May are best: it's drier, less boggy and you won't have to wade through so much mud, though it can get rather hot and steamy toward late May. The rains begin in June and with them come the mosquitoes – bring rain gear, repellent and, if you plan on slinging a hammock, a mosquito net. September and October are peak hurricane and thunderstorm season, with the rains continuing into November, and are best avoided. December to February, with cool nights and mornings, can be quite a pleasant time to visit El Petén.

El Petén Highlights

1 Gazing over the jungle canopy from towering Temple IV at Tikal (p246)

2 Trekking through the jungle to the vast, though still scarcely excavated, Maya city of El Mirador (p260)

3 Awakening to the sound of howler monkeys at Laguna Petexbatún (p231)

4 Night cruising for crocodiles and spotting macaws at the Estación Biológica Las Guacamayas (p260)

5 Lounging lakeside over evening cocktails on the picturesque island/town of Flores (p234)

6 Admiring the sunset over Lago de Petén Itzá from laid-back El Remate (p244)

7 Breaking bread with fellow travelers at the rural retreat of Finca Ixobel (p233)

8 Rolling down the Río de la Pasión to Ceibal (p229), a remote riverside ruin with intricately carved stelae of past Maya rulers

