Temple Bar
Dublin’s best-known district, where mayhem and merriment is standard fare. During daylight hours there are shops and galleries to discover.

North of the Liffey
Grittier than its more genteel southside counterpart, the area immediately north of the River Liffey offers a mix of 18th-century grandeur, traditional city life and the multicultural melting pot that is contemporary Dublin.

Docklands
The gleaming modern blocks of the Docklands – dubbed Silicon Docks – are home to digital tech giants. A couple of architectural beauties stand out among the modern buildings.

Merrion Square & Around
In exquisite Georgian architecture, here you’ll find the perfect mix of imposing public buildings, museums, and private offices and residences.

Kilmainham & the Liberties
Dublin’s oldest neighbourhoods, immediately west of the south city centre, have a handful of big-ticket tourist attractions.

Grafton St & Around
Grafton St is both the city’s most famous street and its unofficial centre, surrounded by a warren of side streets and alleys almost always full of people.

The Southside
The neighbourhoods that border the southern bank of the Grand Canal are less about sights and more about the experience of affluent Dublin.
